95% of care for critically ill babies and children is delivered in dedicated paediatric units throughout the country. However, this also means that around 5,800 babies and children who require emergency transfer every year must undergo long road journeys to reach the specialist treatment required to save their lives. But what if a child's condition is so serious that they may not be moved safely by land? The Children's Air Ambulance rapidly transfers seriously ill children and babies from hospital to these specialist centres by helicopter. Our young patients are those at greatest risk from road journeys: we reduce the risk by keeping time out of hospital to a minimum. Every second counts!
